Issue 21
(Winter 2013)

Centre for Editorial and Intertextual Research
Cardiff University
Romantic Textualities is available on the web at www.romtext.org.uk, and on Twitter @romtext

ISSN 1748-0116

© 2013–14 Centre for Editorial and Intertextual Research

Published by the Centre for Editorial and Intertextual Research, Cardiff University.
Typeset in Adobe Garamond Pro 11 / 12.5, using Adobe InDesign cc; images and illustrations prepared using Adobe Illustrator cc and Adobe PhotoShop cc; final output rendered with Adobe Acrobat xi Professional.

Editor: Anthony Mandal, Cardiff University, UK
Associate Editor: Nicola Lloyd, Cardiff University, UK
Reviews Editor: Katie Garner, University of Cork, Ireland
Editorial Assistants: Esther McConnell, Rhiannon Hayes, Joshua Naylor, Cardiff University, UK

Advisory Board
Peter Garside (Chair), University of Edinburgh, UK
Jane Aaron, University of Glamorgan, UK
Stephen Behrendt, University of Nebraska, USA
Emma Clery, University of Southampton, UK
Benjamin Colbert, University of Wolverhampton, UK
Gillian Dow, University of Southampton / Chawton House Library, UK
Edward Copeland, Pomona College, USA
Gavin Edwards, University of South Wales, UK
Gillian Dow, University of Southampton / Chawton House Library, UK
Penny Fielding, University of Edinburgh, UK
Caroline Franklin, University of Swansea, UK
Isobel Grundy, University of Alberta, Canada
Ian Haywood, University of Roehampton, UK
David Hewitt, University of Aberdeen, UK
Gillian Hughes, Independent Scholar
Claire Lamont, University of Newcastle, UK
Devoney Looser, Arizona State University, US
Robert Miles, University of Victoria, Canada
Rainer Schöwerling, University of Paderborn, Germany
Christopher Skelton-Foord, University of Durham, UK
Kathryn Sutherland, University of Oxford, UK
Graham Tulloch, Flinders University, Australia
Maximiliaan van Woudenberg, Sheridan Institute of Technology, Canada
Nicola Watson, Open University, UK

Aims and Scope: Formerly Cardiff Corvey: Reading the Romantic Text (1997–2005), Romantic Textualities: Literature and Print Culture, 1780–1840 is an online journal that is committed to foregrounding innovative Romantic-studies research into bibliography, book history, intertextuality, and textual studies. To this end, we publish material in a number of formats: among them, peer-reviewed articles, reports on individual/group research projects, bibliographical checklists and biographical profiles of overlooked Romantic writers. Romantic Textualities also carries reviews of books that reflect the growing academic interest in the fields of book history, print culture, intertextuality and cultural materialism, as they relate to Romantic studies.
the cost of coherence and incision. As it is, the book is enjoyably provocative and suitably suggestive, but not wholly satisfying in its conclusions.

Elias Greig
University of Sydney

How might it be possible, ask Evan Gottlieb and Juliet Shields in the introduction to Representing Place in British Literature and Culture, to ‘tell the whole story’ of the intersections of local, regional, national and transnational communities in Britain? This collection of essays was published in March 2013. On the twenty-first of the same month, the Scottish Independence Referendum Bill proposed to ask voters a related but somewhat starker question about the nature of British nationhood. The debates which have since been raised by politicians and media provide plenty of evidence that the problems considered by this volume—of national and local identity, tradition, migration, cosmopolitanism, the perceived dominance of the metropolis—not only are still relevant but are still shaped as much by culture and representation as politics and economics.

Gottlieb and Shields aim to resist the well-known ‘rise of the nation’ narrative of much eighteenth-century British cultural history, in which the nation–state opposes and subdues alternative forms of community. Yet, as Dafydd Moore’s responsive coda warns, it is not enough to simply replace the ‘imagined nation’ with another naïvely conceived ‘imagined region’ (p. 189). The contributions to this collection, instead, work from the assumption that a sense of place is not natural but constructed and reshaped by representation in text. Specifically, as might be expected from a new title in the series ‘British Literature in Context in the Long Eighteenth Century’, this book is interested in the workings of place in written text: mostly poetry, prose and novels, with an opening diversion into Restoration drama. Despite the ‘and Culture’ in its title, the collection’s focus remains very closely on the literary throughout—a category which is defined refreshingly broadly, and within which is produced a detailed, nuanced survey of the role of authorial tradition and reading practice. Nevertheless, given the widely understood centrality to ideas of nation, locality and globe of, for example, landscape art (acknowledged briefly by JoEllen DeLucia), topographical drawings and maps, music and song, and especially metropolitan, local and internationally touring theatres, the need for future complementary projects in other disciplines seems clear.

Eighteenth-century Britishness was, of course, continually defined against foreignness, most often against the vanities, vices and sophistication of the French. A sense of the nation also, though, emerged in terms of local mythologies and ideologies which sometimes opposed and very often laid claim to an authentically British, because ‘un-foreign’, character. The first section of Representing Place in British Literature and Culture, ‘From Local to National’, offers a series of textual case studies of this complex relationship, chronologically ordered from the negotiations of local and London characters in seventeenth-century theatre (in Bridget Orr’s chapter) to the construction, in prose pastoral, of a perhaps more familiarly modern sense of national heritage emerging out of dislocation and nostalgia. Countering London-centric and Anglocentric versions of the formation of Britishness, Juliet Shields foregrounds the ‘centrifugal and peripheral’
(p. 37) nature of the national identities promoted by early eighteenth-century novels such as Penelope Aubin’s Madam de Beaumont, in which a stubbornly virtuous and homogeneous Wales resists the influx of exotic people and corruption spreading from London. Shields’ chapter goes on to demonstrate that this was only one of multiple outlines of British identity which could be delineated in early eighteenth-century novels, each linked to political sentiment and moral character, and attributing value to specific geographical regions within Britain: whether Wales, Scotland, London or the countryside between them.
Moreover, Janet Sorensen argues, in an analysis of the puzzles of Scots poetry in the period, that such localised national identities may both mimic and resist gestures of cultural dominance which sought to portray them as translatable from confusion into harmony, and from obscurity into ‘the standard English of an improving Anglo-Britain’ (p. 56). The mechanics of text, local geography and loss delineated by Paul Westover in this section are echoed by Deidre Lynch in the last full essay of the book, a meditation on the domesticating ‘homes and haunts’ of English literature in the nineteenth century.

The next three chapters situate these complex ideas of nation and locality within a more explicitly transnational context. While Gottlieb’s use of this frame of reference recontextualises some well-rehearsed arguments about the gothic’s relation to nationalism, cosmopolitanism and patriotic conservatism, it is James Mulholland’s formulation of ‘translocal poetics’—as ‘intimate colaborations that cross vast distances’ (p. 130), connecting traditions and cultures into alternative forms of localism—which may provide the most useful tool for understanding the workings of literary texts in an increasingly globalised society. His chapter on the Orientalist poetry of William and Anna Maria Jones calls for a turn towards ‘the muddy middle ground between globalism and localism’ (p. 136) which is not limited to the national.

The book closes with a ‘Return to the Local’, examining Romantic regionalism as a transformative successor to the earlier forms of identity mapped out in previous chapters. Penny Fielding, for example, traces the poetic image of the river as a device structuring the spatial and temporal relationships between local points, seeing in the history of this tradition a movement from the grand national narrative to the Romantic construction of personal autobiography and genius loci. The most intriguing of the authors she discusses is Anna Seward, whose self-described ‘tender local devotions’ (p. 157) are also central to DeLucia’s rich chapter on Midlands literary culture and the development of a British local poetics. Like Fielding, DeLucia recuperates Seward as a poet of the local as well as the national, reflecting in her poems an emerging, decentralised and fragmented (because highly personal) sense of British identity. As such, she is an appropriate reference point for a book which refuses to offer easy or general answers to the complex questions that it poses.

Ruth Scobie
University of Oxford

Hypochondria is a highly suggestive topic for Romantic criticism, as well as for the period itself. The study of how minds and bodies might get entangled in all things psychosomatic (a coinage of Samuel Taylor Coleridge’s, of course) should offer challenges and rewards in Romanticists’ continued struggle to balance the significance of ideal or intellectual worlds against their troubled interaction with material or corporeal substrates, in the wake of the historicist ascendancy. There are also more immediate and pressing gains to be made. In wider contemporary discourse we have lost a sense of how ‘hypochondria’ or ‘psychosomatic’ describe a hugely important and still poorly understood sphere of interaction between body and mind, or have retained only an etiolated sense of these words which takes them to mean purely mental, imaginary, or factitious. The Romantic period did not have this problem because readers and authors were still able (in both clinical and lay writing) to draw on a wide range of medical cultures and sets of ideas, including various models of nervous sensibility or irritability, vitalism and even humoralism (if only in an literary–cultural afterlife bled of theoretical authority or therapeutic application) which could offer a richer sense of the entwining of mental and somatic health in (for example) stress and anxiety, the perception of pain, fatigue, digestive disorder, etc., than we may have even now.

It is therefore one of the most unfortunate deficiencies of George Grinnell’s opaque and difficult book The Age of Hypochondria that the reader never gets a clear history of what the term meant in the period, or the medical contexts from which it emerged. It is extremely surprising that the book barely mentions hypochondriasis as precursor to the later disease concept. When Grinnell discusses connections between hypochondria and melancholia, his account of both terms is based on theoretical concerns rather than a historical sense of what such categories meant to Romantic period patients, doctors, readers or writers. While the book does offer an extended account of Thomas Beddoes’ Hygëia (1802) and a range of references to medical writers such as Cheyne, Blackmore,